Keir Starmer promised to be bold and confront "high opposition" to his public health plans, after a major investigation discovered the service was in a "critical state".

The prime minister said he was prepared to take "controversial" measures to fix the NHS and public health in England after the discovery of cancer surgeon Ara Darzi.

In a speech in the House of Commons, Starmer said he wanted to carry out "a major surgery to stop NHS from falling apart" and take much bolder prevention measures. He said the NHS had to "reform or die" and it would take 10 years to implement necessary changes. "We need the courage, a long-term surgery - important not to stop; we have the challenges - aging of society a major burden of diseases", he said.

The Darzi report concluded that years of neglect by previous governments had left the NHS "in a critical state" and unable to provide timely care for patients, leading to a crisis in demand caused by aging and population growth.

The report said the company was in a "horrible state" and cited evidence from emergency doctors, saying long waits would cause 14,000 more deaths a year.

The prime minister said he was "absolutely convinced" that prevention should be central to the government's plan for the NHS (National Health Service), including fighting dental decay and smoking. He said he was shocked to discover how many children had decayed teeth removed. "There is diet, there is a healthy lifestyle and we have to get into that space", said Starmer. "Some preventive measures will be controversial but I am prepared to be bold even in the face of high opposition; therefore not: Some of our changes will not be universally popular - we know that - but I will do the right thing for our NHS (the American system), for our economy or for our children".

When asked if he thought doctors' unions would accept productivity reforms, Starmer said he was ready to challenge anyone who "inhibits change".

"I said we will do this with the team, and we will", he replied. But I know from my old job in the Home Office that when you try to reform anything, some people will say 'no' - who will? Oh don't do that; it's better as it is... I never do that!

"We need to take this attitude. In my opinion, it is an inhibitor of change; while we say we will do this with people and we will do the same: together we will do it - I know in my heart we will find the way by saying 'Don't do that!'"

"We need to accept this, and we will accept it. This is part of the change we need", said Starmer to Reuters.

Speaking just weeks before the NHS budget, Starmer said the NHS would receive "no money without reform".

"Reform does not mean just spending more money. Clearly, even in difficult financial circumstances a Labour government will invest in the NHS that is needed but we need to fix the system first", he said.

"So, when I say that: no more money without reform. I am not prepared to see more of your spending on staff that costs 5,000 per shift or letters of Starmer disse que reformas de assistência social por muito tempo atrasadas seriam parte do plano governamental para 10 anos, mas qualquer mudança tinha ser alcançável.

Ele disse que estava comprometido com a construção dos 40 novos hospitais prometidos pela primeira vez por Boris Johnson apostas presidente sportingbet 2024, embora tenha enfatizado os planos do governo anterior serem enganosos e irrealistas.
